It all started in the US in 2006. Overnight, entire bee colonies simply went missing. Beekeepers discovered their hives empty of worker bees. Strangely, though, no dead bee bodies were found, and there was no evidence of disease, either. The worker bees had simply disappeared and left their queens behind. Unfortunately, this wasn't just some miserable nightmare. On the contrary, it is a sad reality affecting over a million bee colonies every year, and the beekeepers have no idea what to do.

- List two strange things mentioned in the paragraph. 4%

22. How did the beekeepers respond to the disappearance of bees? 4%

According to scientists, this situation is referred to as Colony Collapse Disorder (CCD) and may result from factors including air pollution, global warming, and shrinking water resources. However, one main contributing factor is the use of pesticides. Plants treated with pesticides pass poisonous artificial chemicals on to bees. When bees touch or eat these pesticides, they suffer brain damage. As a result, they may not know how to find food or return home. Sadly, most of these bees starve to death. Although some of the poisoned bees do make it back home, they carry the poison with them, and thus they pollute their hives and kill the rest of the colony. Shocking reports demonstrate that pesticides have, in just fifty years, reduced the total number of bees by almost half!
